In August of 2009, Dodolab was invited by the Confederation Centre of the Arts to Prince Edward Island to respond to issues surrounding the Experimental Farm in Charlottetown. During our discussions about the future of this large parcel of picturesque land, the concept for the Postcard Places project developed out of an interest in the relationship between iconic landscapes and a place's sense of identity.

The Postcards Places were created from landscape photographs taken on the island during the artists' visit and turned into the format of a tourist postcard – a device that often propagates particular ideas about place through iconic landscape imagery. But the postcards of the project are different in that they do not present a unified sense of identity that can be easily presented to visitors as a singular idea. Captivating titles are conspicuously missing – partially as an acknowledgement of our status as visitors to the landscape, but also as a question that provokes the naming of these places by individuals for themselves. The captions on the back of the cards – a place usually devoted to interesting bits of historical fact – are taken up by obvious fictions. These poetic fragments are thus newly stitched onto the landscape by the postcards in a playful, almost surreal, way that explores the relationship between narrative and place.

The postcards were given to both residents and visitors of the Island so that project would quietly disseminate beyond its place of origin as the cards were taken and perhaps even sent away. And though they may have been used much like regular postcards, The Postcard Places carry with themselves a more complex and ambiguous sense of the Islands's identity that goes with them as they travel thus spreading questions about landscape, place, and the stories that are told about these things.

When the bees took over the garden it grew wild with yellow flowers.

Trees dressed in their finest for the afternoon tennis match on the green.

on window sills.*

Every night the beaches are shrouded in black to mourn the passing of time.

At 1:16pm each day the sea and sky switch places.
