Totems poles tower above those below brotherly sentries adorned with sneering eyes, scythe beaks,
 crumbling teeth entrenched in rictus grins Splits and cracks run the length, hollow weeds which race through curled talons and folded wings, poised to wrench themselves free Yet, they perch on more docile figures hands clasped over chests benign faces at peace, content in their placing There is no hierarchy here

Their flashes snarl, punctuating layers of dust and age fragments blazing into life for half a breath, then sinking back into rigid years

Before the light has faded, there rushes a buzz excited cries and feet, a streaming procession dangling clipboards and shoelaces, clambering over stone and clutching at rock their frantic giggles drifting upwards, encircling cornices from centuries past
