About the work:
 Dave Dymont's piece for In-Site Toronto is a series of found texts, originally posted as boast, heresy, rumour and slander, about celebrity encounters. They were compiled from a variety of online forums, blogs and comments pages. By collecting these online texts, and then returning them to the context of the web as though fragments of found poetry, the texts both perpetuate and undermine the image of various celebrities. The work interrogates notions of celebrity and how this has expanded vastly through online channels, generating masses of information that is both fascinating and banal.
