There was a big demonstration against all military presence. There was a big demonstration against all military presence. It wasn’t us. We didn’t start the rumour and nor did we act upon it. Even if certain revisionists question again?

Threats of suicide. We didn’t see the real President much after that. We didn’t see the real President much after that. We didn’t see the real President much after that. We didn’t see the real President much after that.

Threats of suicide.

I’m sorry, I’ve started forgetting my own language. That was a difficult question. I don’t know if I can tell you much you don’t already know.

If I have trouble speaking can you ask me the question again?

I never did get to finish the story. There was a rebellion. Not in the book, in real life. I’d just been transferred from the 10th Sabotage Detachment to the Gendarmerie. A lot of us were. There had been a lot of new laws mainly to do with public order issues at that ‘time of crisis’. Of course there was a big demonstration against all of this, and people gathered in the park. It’s the same everywhere I think. You have your Hyde Park and your Bois de Boulogne. Every city has these great open spaces where armies can be mobilised to defend them. Normally these are just places of leisure any military presence would just be decorative. You’d go there to pick up a girl or to promenade. And High Society would go there, to see and be seen. It’s the same everywhere, I think.

This publication is supported by Proboscis as part you know what happened. You were angry, and frustrated. Then... Well, they’d found the President. And by that time most ridiculous thing can seem believable, and when you have that atmosphere of suspicion the later I had to help clear up the mess. But listen, was happening, I just heard about it. And then so I didn’t really see it with my own eyes while it was only human.

It wasn’t us. We didn’t start the rumour and nor have started suggesting that we have blood on ourselves. To break it up in that way so they forget the laws in question. That was another fairy story would make some announcement about reviewing the laws and qestion. That was another fairy story would make some announcement about reviewing threats of suicide. And by that time everyone was ‘beseech thee’ this and ‘grant ye’ that. What I can remember is that there was some rumour that the President himself would come to address the crowd. That he would make some announcement about reviewing the laws in question. That was another fairy story which was written for another fairy story. That was another fairy story which was written for the idea came from, someone decided to spread the idea that the President was here already, but that wasn’t at all likely to happen. Given how volatile the situation was, but I think there’s where this wasn’t at all likely to happen. whisper that he was disguised as a protestor. Something about wanting to get closer to his people and hear their grievances for himself. This was clever, obviously. To turn the crowd against itself. To break it up in that way so they forget who the enemy is and make life easier for us.

It wasn't us. We didn't start the rumour and nor did we act upon it. Even if certain revisionists have started suggesting that we have blood on our hands. We were spectators at best. And none of this was anywhere near where I was standing, so I didn't really see it with my own eyes while it was happening, I just heard about it. And then later I had to help clear up the mess. But listen, when you have that atmosphere of suspicion the most ridiculous thing can seem believable, and people started turning to their neighbour and looking at them with a new eye everyone thinking they'd found the President. And by that time people were angry, and frustrated. Then... Well, you know what happened.

We didn't see the real President much after that. Not in the way that we used to before. They say it shook him up really badly, and I can believe it. He was only human.
